Frank Mainville Tanner Earns a Place In Ecological History

Dr. Howard Tanner may go down in history as the man who conceived the ecological concept of the century—successful introduction of salmon to the Great Lakes.

When Howard—a trustee of Acton County—returned to Michigan in 1864 to become the state's fish chief, he was given a well-earned reputation as a developer of salmon.

Although Howard accepted the post of director of natural resources at Michigan State University before he earned his doctorate in 1886 before the first adult coho spawning run...

Last summer's year was named "State Conservation of the Year" by the Michigan Dialect Conservation Club as "Tanner and his co-workers."

Quality Fish Hearing Set

Proposed changes in special trout fishing regulations covering 77 miles of the Au Sable, Little Manistee and Big Manistee River systems will be discussed at a public hearing March 19 in Grayling.

The special restrictions conflict with beneficial and create law enforcement problems, Bertram explains.

The proposed brook trout management plan, which is the statewide limit, reflects the biological fact that these fish rarely reach nine inches and are being wanted instead of bred.

A rich, dark, yellowish brown, tinged to black on the head, the marten is a small cat about twice the size of a fox squirrel.

It's coat is marked with a large irregular patch of pale buff or white on the head and breast and white on the sides.
